LegalNotice A: The word "winpcsign" is misspelled in your title. Q: What makes web service implementations so difficult? I've been learning Spring Web Services for my current project, and I find it quite easy to get the basic theorems of WS implementation out of the way, yet I struggle to see how making a http interface and some stubs to the client is any different from implementing an ADT or doing data access via a database. Is it because I'm using Spring that I don't see the complexities involved? I've also read at length about what SOAP actually is, and how to use it, but I still don't see how it is different to any other implementation. Is it because the deal is so much easier that web services become "boring"? The answer may seem obvious to 570a42141b
